Around the globe - Who's employing?

>find out the answer at the Informatics Global Employment Services via www.informaticsgroup.com/gef

19 July 2005, Singapore - International employment opportunities have grown in recent years and an internationally recognised qualification is the key to the door of global employment.

"Securing global employment is functionally dependent on the intrinsic value of the qualifications offered by an educational institution. With the premium higher education programmes offered by Informatics, students are assured of high quality, globally recognized qualifications that will be looked favourably upon by employers." David Allan D'Souza, Director - Curriculum Development and Management of Informatics Global Higher Education division.

International careers have long been the path up the corporate ladder. In earlier years, these positions include substantial benefits, both financial and personal, with first class travel, unlimited expense accounts, and free time to enjoy the local culture.

'However, today's overseas assignments typically bring long hours, minimal economic reward, and coach class travel. Yet the reward of upward mobility within the corporate world continues to lure young executives to global assignments.'

While overseas assignments are attractive and our internationally recognised qualification allows our students to step into the global market, the Global Employment Services became a useful tool for them to undertake a career search in countries thousands of miles away and in a different time zone.

Today, students at Informatics can find out who's employing around the world easily at a click away via the Informatics Global Employment Services powered by JobStreet.com.
